WISE MAN once said: "The best history of a nation is the biography of its great men." In a similar spirit we say: "The best account of a successful community is an account of the doings of its active men." With this truth in mind, the writers approached the task of giving a brief account of Ogden and at the same time making clear the source of its remarkable progress and prosperity. We soon came to the conclusion that this community is fortunate in the energy, character, forcefulness and resourcefulness of the men who are directing its business and civic enterprises. We therefore present this little book and wish to state that in it we have attempted to sketch in brief outline some of the characteristics of men who have made Ogden and who are engaged in making Greater Ogden. An important effect on the authors personally as the result of their coming in closer contact and thereby making a closer study of this city's men of affairs, is an increased pride in the community of which we are a part, and a firm faith in its continued growth and development, not only in material things but in all things tending to the development of the best citizenship.
